Are you facing a very real possibility of losing custody of your baby because you have a substance use disorder?

Are you about to become a parent and realize you might have an addiction and don't know where to turn for help?

Are you feeling overwhelmed by mandated child welfare requirements and fear you may not be able to keep up and get your child back?

Homeward House is here for you.

Homeward House provides wrap-around services and support for parents who are striving to overcome poverty and substance use disorders.

Certified parent ally mentors — parents who have overcome similar challenges and are now living healthy, productive lives — build relationships with parents and support them step by step.

We welcome families with newborns or infants up to one year old (as well as those who are expecting), who are living at or below the federal poverty level and have an active substance use disorder.

Services include enriched parent/child visitation, assistance with basic needs, support from an infant mental health specialist, and assistance with education and employment — all at no cost.
